Washington Mutual to Acquire Providian
A closer look at Washington Mutual...

With last week's announcement of the pending acquisition of Providian by Washington Mutual, you undoubtedly have questions about the Seattle-based company. First of all, as Joe has said, Providian will become part of Washington Mutual but will remain substantially intact operationally. To familiarize you with Washington Mutual, here is a brief overview of its business structure, corporate culture and management staff.

Company Overview

Washington Mutual is one of the country's largest financial institutions, with nearly $320 billion in assets. After the merger is complete, Washington Mutual will be the fifth largest consumer lender in the United States. Washington Mutual has more than 52,000 employees in over 2,400 commercial banking, mortgage lending, financial services and retail banking offices across the country.

Washington Mutual currently has three main business lines:

Retail Banking Washington Mutual's award-winning, patented Occasio retail banking approach combines banking and friendly customer service in a unique, welcoming environment. The concept represents the company's innovative, holistic approach to retail banking, combining a variety of elements to create an inviting customer experience.

Mortgage Banking Washington Mutual is one of the country's leading mortgage lenders for middle market consumers. Last year, WaMu funded more than $250 billion in home loans for individuals and families.

Commercial Banking Washington Mutual is the nation's leading apartment lender, originating a record $8.16 billion in apartment loans in 2004.

The acquisition of Providian will make credit cards Washington Mutual's fourth line of business. Providian's financial and management strengths, along with the focus on mainstream American consumers, is a natural fit for Washington Mutual, which had been working to diversify into the credit card industry.

Company Culture

Like Providian, Washington Mutual has a strong set of corporate values: Fair, Caring, Human, Dynamic, and Driven. Its goals and business practices are in line with the Providian Values of Integrity, Respect, Excellence, Clarity, and Teamwork in dealing with customers and co-workers.

The Washington Mutual brand and corporate culture are friendly and customer-focused. Washington Mutual's employees take a light-hearted approach to their identity; in fact, they affectionately call the company WaMu (pronounced Wah-Moo) and the employees WaMuliens. The company works hard to make its offices open, positive, and supportive to motivate and inspire employees, and help them develop and grow. Its progressive workplace has received numerous honors, such as FORTUNE Best Companies to Work For in 2003 and 2004, FORTUNE Best Companies for Minorities, Working Woman Best Companies for Executive Women, and Working Woman Best Supplier Diversity Ranking.

Washington Mutual employees, like Providian's, are generous and giving in their communities. Employees give thousands of hours of volunteer time and millions of dollars in donations to their communities each year. The company encourages its employees to donate time and energy to worthy causes and employees who work 20 hours or more per week are eligible for up to four hours of paid time off each month to do volunteer work. And, just as we do at Providian, WaMu also partners with local nonprofits to help those in need. One of the company's premier nonprofit programs is an exclusive partnership with Earvin Magic Johnson and the Johnson Development Corporation to bring affordable home loans to urban borrowers. To date, the success of the program has led to 22 urban home loan offices being opened.

Management Team

Washington Mutual is led by Chairman and CEO Kerry Killinger, who joined the company in 1982. In 2001, American Banker magazine named him its Banker of the Year. Under his leadership, Washington Mutual has grown into the sixth largest financial institution in the U.S.

Stephen Rotella is the company's President and Chief Operating Officer. He came to Washington Mutual in 2005 from JPMorganChase. Providian CEO Joe Saunders will report to Mr. Rotella once the acquisition is complete.

In the News

WaMu/Providian transaction gains significant media coverage

The announcement that Washington Mutual would acquire Providian has garnered significant media attention, with stories appearing in most major newspapers and coverage on many national and local TV and radio stations. Providian provided additional comments to The New York Times, The Los Angeles Times, the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, Dow Jones, Barrons.com, New England Cable News, and PRWeek magazine, just to name a few, and Joe took part in interviews with the San Francisco Chronicle and Seattle Post-Intelligencer. Following are some statements regarding the acquisition:

We are moving into a new era and it's a better era than we have seen. We have come a long way in three years. Joe Saunders in Monday's investor call

"[Providian is] a dramatically different company than it was three or four years ago. Most of the portfolio is right in the sweet spot for WaMu - it's more of what we call the broad middle market... it matches our customer base well. Kerry Killinger, Washington Mutual Chairman and CEO, quoted in The LA Times

Washington Mutual's size and resources will allow us to operate with a lower cost structure and greater efficiency than we could on our own. The compelling combination also enables us to leverage the strength of Washington Mutual's nationally recognized brand and utilize its more than 2,000 retail stores as a new growth channel. Joe Saunders in Providian's press release

It would give us a certain amount of diversification and help smooth out the revenue streams over time. It's a highly profitable business if it's done correctly, and we think the team at Providian has done a great job turning things around.

Kerry Killinger quoted in The LA Times

If you look at the products we have available to our customers, the credit card is a major hole in that offering. We are looking at developing a balanced business model that has diversification, and credit cards gives us an improvement in that. Kerry Killinger quoted in The New York Times

Answers to Some Common Questions

Naturally, employees have a lot of questions concerning the acquisition. While many of the details will be worked out over the next few months, here are a few common questions for which we currently have answers.

Are we still going to issue Providian cards, or are they going to be Washington Mutual cards?

We will retain the Providian brand at least through the close of the merger and perhaps beyond. According to Kerry Killinger, we will spend the interim looking carefully at the Providian brand to assess whether to retain the brand within the credit card division. What we do know is that Washington Mutual customers will receive a Washington Mutual branded credit card. In any case, as Joe said, "When you have 10 million customers, you can't just flip something overnight."

Who will be our CEO after the merger?

Washington Mutual's Chairman and CEO Kerry Killinger will lead our combined companies. Joe Saunders will continue to head the credit card division, reporting to Steve Rotella, Washington Mutual's president and chief operating officer.

Is there a specific date for the completion of the merger?

There is no specific date for the completion of the transaction, although we anticipate it will be sometime in the fourth quarter of this year, following regulatory and Providian shareholder approval.

What was the total purchase price?

WaMu will acquire Providian for a total transaction value of approximately $6.5 billion in stock and cash (based on the valuation on the date the merger agreement was signed).

When am I going to hear something new?

We are currently working on a communications plan and we will keep employees posted on any significant new developments as they occur.
